However, in a new study published in Evolutionary Psychology, researchers have found that many other species show some form of an instinctive, pro-social behavior. What is Compassion? For many years, researchers have argued that compassion is an exclusive human quality. They believe only we humans are capable of showing compassion to one another. However, new research, published in Evolutionary Psychology, finds that animals also show compassion toward other individuals. The research was conducted by Yi Sun and Amy C. Lin from the University of British Columbia (UBC). They introduced the subject to Asian monkeys at the Primate Research Institute in Japan. Although they knew that the animals would not be able to read the scientific literature, they also wanted to show their subjects that the subject was covered. To do this, Sun and Lin trained the monkeys to correctly execute a series of gestures toward the researchers. They were surprised to find that the monkeys were capable of showing compassion. The researchers then asked the monkeys to choose between a peanut and an apple for their next meal. They found that monkeys were much more willing to give the more-preferred food item to a hungry peer. In addition, the researchers found that monkeys preferred to give away their food to a peer who had just eaten than to someone who had not eaten yet. In the second set of experiments, researchers trained three of the monkeys to deliver either a peanut or an apple to other monkeys. Monkeys such as shown here, while often deemed nasty or mischievous, are actually “gentle and curious” and are often referred to as monkeys of the “monkey friendly” kind. Some studies say they are even considered to be the “most intelligent species.” (Photo: M.S.
